"At another village," mentioning the name of it, "a farm of 400 or 500 acres lies vacant, another of 300 or 400, and another of 400 acres. All these are on one estate. There is another estate lying away yonder in another direction which has unoccupied farms of a total extent of about 2,100 acres and another of 600 acres," and so the speaker proceeded with a list which apparently he could have list which apparently he could have continued almost indefinitely.

You may hear any number of such litties in almost any village of Lincolnshire, which, I suppose, is not conspicuously worse than any other agricultural counties. All being well, however, the people make £5 or so at the harvest, and this may be taken to make up losses at other times; so that twelve shillings may be taken, perhaps, fairly to represent the weekly wages of agricultural laborers. An Elephant's Revenge

While driving the herd of elephants belonging to the Forepaugh show to the station in New Brunswick, N. J., John Murphy, of this city, an elephant keeper, was trampled upon by one of the beasts and sustained a broken ankle and three broken ribs. In the afternoon Mr. Murphy had occasion to prod one of the elephants several times quite severely in getting it into the ring, and the brute remem bered him and was revenged. Mr. Murphy was riding by its side on horseback, when suddenly the elephant pulled him off the saddle with its trunk, threw him on the ground and attempted to stamp upon him. Other showmen heard Murphy's cries and came to his rescue.-Philadelphia Record.
